Verdict still out on school closings

Robert Borucki didn't say the Green Bay School District is going to close the Howe School, or the Roosevelt School, or the Whitney School.

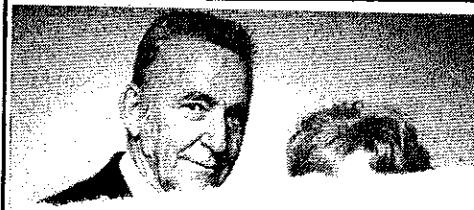

On the other hand, he didn't say nay.

Borucki, elementary curriculum coordinator for the district, spoke to about 100 people Monday night at the Union Congregational Church on South Madison Street.

The crowd was comprised of members of the Midtown East Citizens Association, Astor Neighborhood Association, WHISCO (the parent's organization of Whitney School), and the parent-teacher organizations of Howe and Roosevelt Schools.

The people were concerned about the possibility that, in its new austerity program, the school district might close one or more of the three neighborhood schools.

Borucki talked about maintenance costs, the feasibility of busing, the cost of upgrading the three schools and heating costs.

Should one of the schools be closed, he said, the school district could save an estimated $100,000 per year.

Borucki will probably recommend to the School Board Property Committee Wednesday night that one of the three schools should be closed in 1979, and possibly that two of them should be closed down.

Asked about the possibility, during a special meeting of the school board Monday at City Hall, district business manager Harvey Humke commented only that several different avenues have been discussed, and the possibility of closing the schools in question was only one of the many subjects covered in recent administration studies.
